Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: ...that it is in that view that this Amendment ought to be pressed. Suppose I am accused of intimidating a person unknown, how can I prove a negative? But you look about for certain classes of persons, and you say this class of individuals has been intimidated. I say, produce one specimen. You do nothing of the kind; and I do put it to the Committee whether that is a reasonable and a proper Code that is to exist for all time? I myself have intimidated people in speeches that I have made over and over again, and I am happy to say that I have brought them in that way into courses which are right. Lord Salisbury endeavours to intimidate the Conservative Members, and successfully, to go against that which they believe to be a right and just course. We say to the people of Ireland, if you grab land you are doing wrong, and certain regrettable consequences will follow. You say that is intimidating a person unknown; and, being the master of legions, you say it is wrong, and it shall be punished. I ask you again to re-clothe yourselves in your Conservative mind as it existed in Anno Domini 1875, when you had no Liberal Unionists with you, when you were purely Conservative--before, so to speak, the primrose had been crossed by the orchid. I do ask in these circumstances, if simply on the ground of defence, that you should allow us to defend ourselves. I have defended a good many men, and most of them unsuccessfully, I must confess, because most of the juries have been rigged. It may have been my fault. I do beseech the Committee to allow us to have some opportunity of defending ourselves; but if we are to be accused of intimidating persons who are unknown, I say it will be wholly impossible to have any line of defence under the circumstances. I therefore d...
